Crossings):

A Confluence of Transatlantic Networks: Elites, Capitalism, and Confederate Migration to Brazil is a study in Atlantic world history that examines the qualitative nature of capitalism's processes through the lens of social networks.

"In this thoroughly researched and erudite study, Laura Jarnagin suggests a new paradigm for understanding the oft-studied migration of thousands of former Confederates from the American South to Brazil in the years immediately following the end of the Civil War." --"American Historical"
"The rich detail extracted from the archives is the book's great strength. . . .The transatlantic connections unearthed in these sources convince the reader that the study of such networks greatly enriches our understanding of the history of all the colonies/countries in the Atlantic world. Jarnagin provides intriguing evidence, for example, that Anglo-Portuguese trading networks with strong political connections generated much of the early market momentum for coffee production in Brazil." --"Hispanic American Historical"
"About the Author Laura Jarnagin is associate professor and director, Division of Liberal Arts and International Studies, Colorado School of Mines.
