Catalogers hungry for hard-to-find answers regarding the best way to insure access to diverse new content will find expert solutions in this vital new resource. Streaming video, Internet sites, dual-disc DVDs, blogs and listservs are just some of the rapidly emerging, and often complicated, new resources covered in this current, easy-to-follow manual. Authors Mary Beth Weber and Fay Austin dedicate separate chapters to each non-print and e-resource format, and include corresponding examples to help demonstrate practical implementation of these critical new skills. A companion CD-ROM contains fully-worked out examples, models and illustrations, and acts as an important visual guide to help reinforce key concepts. Practical and user-friendly, this essential guide to 21st century cataloging will teach you to organize your constantly expanding collection of materials with both optimal efficiency and increased discoverability.

"This is an up-to-date and handy desk reference for catalogers of electronic, digital cartographic, sound, video, Internet, database, and other mixed media. It's also suitable for non-tech services librarians. With a useful CD-ROM for step-by-step help and a companion website that will be updated as necessary. Recommended." --Library Journal, April 2011 "a wide-ranging and up-to-date guide for cataloging nonprint materials in all formats Highly recommended for catalogers of nonprint materials." --Catholic Library World, September 2011 "Describing Electronic, Digital, and Other Media Using AACR2 and RDA is a practical guide for using both the old standard (AACR) and the new (RDA-Resource Description and Access). Mary Beth Weber and Fay Angela Austin have prepared a commonsense guide to using the new code." --American Libraries, November/December 2011 "This book is highly recommended for technical services staff struggling with changing cataloging rules for certain types of nonbook materials." --Technicalities, November/December 2011 About the Author Mary Beth Weber is head of Central Technical Services at Rutgers University Libraries, New Jersey. Fay Angela Austin is Head of the Monographs Cataloging and Database Management Section within Central Technical Services at Rutgers University Libraries, New Jersey.
