The authors of the documents strive to define a museum as distinct from other exhibitory institutions, and to explicate the purpose of museums. They debate the composition, methods, and function of the new museum or the modern museum, which was predominately the public museum, though university and privately funded museums are also a part of the new museology. Most of the authors maintained that education was the primary purpose of museums, with a strong focus on science and the scientific nature of museology as a profession. Many of the authors focused on natural history collections. In the case of art museums, the topics of aesthetics and proper citizenship were introduced as alternative models for the museums purpose. For those interested in museum history and philosophy or cultural history, this is an essential resource.

In any case, the books editors have compiled an indispensable sourcebook for those wanting to become acquainted with the museums transition from an institution of sensational curiosities to one of scientific rigor and social virtue. - Bradley J.
