F. L.I thought I knew a lot about what happened in Rwanda between 1990 and 1994 -- and afterwards -- having read some of the original documents (such as Stam Davenport's research, and the leaked UN "Mapping Report" etc.), as well as knowing some survivors/refugees/exiles personally. None of what was in the recently presented BBC documentary on Kagame was news to me. However, just in the first 40 pages (I have not completed reading the book), she gave me an insight into the complexities of inter-group conflicts leading up to the infamous "100 days" that had escaped me before. She was able to do so because of her travels and relationships within Rwanda and abroad that cut across ethnic (Hutu/Tutsi) and REGIONAL lines, as well as socio-economic lines. She pulls no punches but is remarkably even handed in her descriptions of both Hutu and Tutsi friends and colleagues. The "miracle economy" and "new society" of Rwanda is a fraud, but if the current despotic regime is to be replaced in a peaceful way and former enemies are to find ways to rebuild on a foundation that is not the lie our mass media have been repeating, they must draw upon experiences and insights of people such as Marie Beatrice Umutesi. 0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. Five Stars By CustomerAwesome 11 of 12 people found the following review helpful. A story of incredible courage and humanity By J. Emerson This is the tragic and triumphant autobiography of a Rwandan Hutu woman who, after living for a couple of years as an internally displaced person in Rwanda and then surviving the horrific conditions in the camps that were - illegally - set up in by the UN in Zaire within shelling distance of the Rwandan border and further down the road in the death camp at Tingi Tingi, decided, along with tens of thousands of others to try to escape from the murderous attacks of Kagame's RPF, UN bounty hunters and Kabila's troops by taking to the roads in an effort to find a way out of the country. She took around ten children, none of them her own, with her and tried, mostly unsuccessfully, to keep them alive during months of trekking through trackless tropical forests during the rainy season, walking barefoot on blistering roads, eating whatever they could scavenge in the deserted villages along the way. We have heard a lot about the tragedy of the Tutsi genocide in 1994. What we haven't heard, partly because the press has been manipulated by the current Tutsi regime in Rwanda and partly because the U. S. continues to count on Kagame to keep our access open to the minerals in Congo - particularly coltan, which is used in cell phones and computers - is that as many Hutu as Tutsi have been killed both before and after 1994. Books like "We Wish to Inform You that Tomorrow We Will Be Killed With Our Families" by Philip Gourevitch were highly misleading and only served to reinforce the mistaken view that all Hutu were genocidal and all Tutsi innocent victims, and as a result the world has let at least 750,000 innocent Hutu be slaughtered while their killers enjoy impunity. And that is not even counting the 3,000,000 Congolese who have died. The first chapters of the book give an overview of the history Rwanda and life in the camps, and the rest of it deals with Umutesi's trek across Zaire. It is even handed, understated, immensely powerful and very timely. It was published in French, Spanish, Catalan and Dutch before being translated into English.

In this firsthand account of inexplicable brutality, day-to-day suffering, and survival, Marie Beatrice Umutesi sheds light on the other genocide that targeted the Hutu refugees of Rwanda after the victory of the Rwandan Patriotic Front in 1994. Umutesi's documentation of these years provides the world a history that is still widely unknown. Available in English for the first time, this poignant autobiography is more than a testimony to the lives and humanity lost; it is a call for those responsible for the atrocious crimes - and the devastating silence - to be held accountable.

From Publishers Weekly "I have been through Hell, have known horror, and now that I have escaped... I give testimony to what I have seen." So begins Umutesi's personal account of the bloody ethnic confrontations between Tutsi and Hutu in Rwanda and neighboring Zaire, culminating in the 1994 slaughter of Tutsi and moderate Hutus. A Hutu often "taken for a Tutsi," sociologist Umutesi fled to Zaire in 1994 and spent two years in the refugee camps, witnessing the destruction of the camps and the subsequent ethnic massacres of Hutu refugees by Rwandan soldiers and Zairian rebels. Her tone encompasses both a sociologist's objectivity and a sufferer's anguish, describing malnutrition and famine, cholera and dysentery, panic and brutality. There were two genocides, this book argues, with barbaric acts committed by and against Hutus and permitted by an international community that "seemed more interested in gross acts of war than in the plight of the people being killed every day, of those who were hiding in the ceilings, woods, ditches, and swamps." Acts of kindness and heroism occur, but this is painful, bitter reading. Umutesi is unable to answer the question with which she began "What led us to this extremity?" but her compelling account of that extremity is a valuable historical document. Jan Vansina, "African Studies" "Umutesi helps us better understand the fear that has fueled a history of violence between both Tutsi and Hutu Rwanda . . . and the utter failure of the international organizations, governments, and media to tell the truth." Aili Mari Tripp, series editor Passages of Umutesi's book rank with some of the most effective antiwar literature of the twentieth century.
